APPENDIX:

ARCHITECTURAL HISTORIAN'S REPORT

The buildings of the study represent the values and aspirations of the people during the periods in which they were built. In reviewing the study area it appears to separate itself into three distinct zones, each reflecting differences in these values and aspirations. For the purpose of identification, I will term these "zones" the early historical on the one extreme, the modern on the other extreme, and the current downtown as the union of these two extremes.

Early Historical Zone:

This zone incorporates both sides of Second Street, starting from the Railroad Depot and stretching toward the East. The buildings of this zone were some of the first in Bartlesville. They are primarily utilitarian buildings built of locally produced brick and are constructed in a standard, straight forward manner.

Those closest to the Railroad Depot were among the first built. Accordingly, they are the most straight-forward; load bearing structures with minimal detail. I believe these people were most concerned with establishing themselves, and the buildings represent this. But there is some detail, even though minimal, and this seems to indicate that they cared about their image, thus taking pride in their building, an extension of themselves. The detail is executed solely with brick, a permanent material which was within their budget.

Progressing down Second Street, the buildings become more elaborately detailed, thus indicating that mere survival was no longer as great an issue. People now were competing with each other, as well as making the statement that this place is worth something--the first roots of the pride which is obvious in the city of Bartlesville today. This more elaborate detail shows traces of the Eclectic styles which were popular at the turn of the century (particularly in the area of 112-120 Second Street), and indicates that the people of Bartlesville were in contact with and valued the trends of the time.

Another point which is evident in this zone is that transportation was still limited. People walked from place to place, thus the growth of the city directly adjacent to the Railroad Depot. This location also reduced transportation of heavy goods, such as building materials, to a minimum of effort.

One of the results of this pedestrian orientation was that each building was situated as closely together as possible. This made for a focused city core with walls at the edges of the streets.

All of these characteristics combined to provide the early citizens of Bartlesville with a definite "sense of place."

Modern Zone:

The definition of the zone known as Modern is less defined than the Early Historical zone, but follows a vague line east of Johnstone Avenue and south of Fifth Street. This zone does not define itself by focusing on a specific area (ie. the street) with buildings that are directly adjacent to one another. Rather it represents a different approach toward building. In this approach each building is a unique entity unto itself. Perhaps the best example of this is the Price Tower at Sixth and Dewey. This is a superb example of the work of Frank Lloyd Wright which illustrates a people that highly values architectural form, quality materials, and structural integrity. It is meant to be viewed as an object independent of its surroundings. The building is pulled back from the street and separated from the other buildings nearby. This is a very different approach than we see on Second Street.

Other examples which also illustrate this approach to building are the Presbyterian Church and the Community Center. They are examples which utilize very high quality materials in enriching detail. Their forms have been closely studied and designed. Obviously they have the pride in themselves and their place that the earlier citizens of Bartlesville had, if not more. Obviously their affluence was much greater. But why did they choose to separate the building from the street?

No doubt part of the reason that the urban pattern is different is that this area changed from a more dispersed residential area to a commercial area. But that change occurred during a different time than the Second Street developments. Technology had altered the way people lived. The tendency of Modern architecture was to call attention to itself, to stand out. It was a product of this new age, that of the post-Industrial Revolution. At the same time, we saw the emergence of the automobile, which made people more mobile--transportation easier. It also changed the speed and scale from which people viewed things. Finally, it was necessary to store the automobile; thus, the parking lots which isolate buildings from one another. All of these contributed to some degree in the transformation from a pedestrian-oriented city to an automobile-oriented city which has a very different "sense of place."

Current Downtown

The current downtown area is geographically between the two identified zones, and illustrates a middle ground between these two approaches toward city development. Here we see the mix of contemporary architecture such as the Phillips Building (Second Generation Modern), First National Bank Building (Second Generation Modern), and Plaza Building (a very tasteful Post-Modern) with the historical architecture such as the Neoclassical Frank Phillips Tower, Wards Building, and Masonic Lodge.

All of these buildings illustrate a more developed, affluent civilization than the Second Street development. Their materials are more varied and costly, their decoration more elaborate. Craftsmen and transportation of these elements must have been available. Again, Bartlesville's pride is evident.

Buildings are individual elements; they project upward and they utilize different materials. Yet they also work together to define the street corridor and provide a focused environment. In addition to mixing the styles of building, this area mixes the automobile and the pedestrian in a very successful way. Phillips Plaza, for example, provides a wonderful pedestrian area isolated from the automobile. This zone now possesses a rich "sense of place" which is completely different from either of the other two zones.

Bartlesville is unique in possessing three such clearly identified zones of development within a geographic area where it is possible to experience each. The continuous development of the city, and its constant emphasis on quality, is in part due to the patronage of families such as the Phillips and the Price's, but development on this scale is a tribute to all the people of the community. The sense of past, present, and future which exists in Bartlesville must be retained in order to understand and appreciate each.
